PARIS, May 25.

WHEN the baniſhment of the parliament was moved in council, marſhal Noailles ſtrongly oppoſed it. He told the king, among other things, "That as he had been always firmly attached to the king, his great grand father; and he hoped, his majeſty would do him the juſtice to believe that he was on the point of going to give account of his actions at the tribunal of heaven, he would not diſſemble his ſentiments, nor ſpeak againſt his conſcience; that it was his opinion, the parliament ought not to be baniſhed, &c." This diſtinguiſh'd nobleman was not ſingular in his opinion. Many of the higheſt rank appeared to be of the ſame mind. So that thoſe who puſhed matters to a dangerous extremity, will perhaps fall victims to their rigor, and repent their conduct when too late.

Paris, May 28. An authentic copy of the famous remonſtrance is at length publiſhed. The preamble is as follows:

SIR,

"The moſt eſſential intereſt of a ſovereign is to know the truth; and it is the office of your parliament to bring it to the foot of your throne. But never was this duty more intimately connected with the inviolable fidelity which they have ſworn to your majeſty, than at preſent, when the moſt valuable rights of our religion and the preſervation of our conſtitution are at ſtake. Both are equally threatened by the manifeſt ſchiſm which has excited our zeal: And this ſchiſm, too long neglected, has taken ſuch deep root, and daily makes ſuch rapid progreſs, that in a little time no bounds will reſtrain it.

"Already, Sir, the ordinary courſe of juſtice is interrupted, the moſt neceſſary forms violated, the people harraſſed, the offenders hardened, the judges vilified, intimidated, thwarted, or even reduced to inaction. Already the violent ſhocks occaſioned by the ſchiſm, have diſcovered an empire which is riſing in the midſt of your ſtate; an arbitrary empire, which acknowledges no laws, no ſovereign, no magiſtrates; to which religion is only a pretext; the authority of the prince an inſtrument which it preſumes to uſe or lay aſide according to its intereſts; the fundamental laws of the ſtate, a troubleſome yoke; and the juſt liberty of the ſubjects, an imaginary title.

"Were our grievances leſs preſſing we ſhould be afraid, Sir, to acquaint your majeſty with ſuch frightful preſages, and to beſpeak your attention to the ſtriking repreſentation of the blows given to the very eſſence of the monarchy: But every conſideration muſt give way to the ſafety of the ſtate, to the preſervation of your crown, to the ſolemn oaths we have taken, and to the confidence with which we have been always honoured by the kings your predeceſſors, and by your majeſty yourſelf. Can we forget, Sir, the moving words of one of your anceſtors, which the preſent troubles make us imagine we ſtill hear? 'You know, and deplore with me, the miſeries of the kingdom, and the dangers to which it is expoſed; aſſiſt me in remedying them, in order to ſave it.' This, Sir, is the ſole object about which we are employed; it is the principle of the indefatigable activity, which has long ſupplied your parliament with that ſtrength which is ſupported by no other intereſt; of that ſteady firmneſs with which it oppoſes the enterpriſes of ſeveral eccleſiaſtics; and of that perſeverance in ſacrificing our ſleeping and our waking hours to the good of the nation. In fine, Sir, it is the ſame ſpirit which brings your parliament to the feet of the throne, to repreſent to your majeſty, that the only reſource of the ſtate conſiſts in maintaining the fundamental laws of the monarchy.

"A work, compoſed and publiſhed by order of your Auguſt great grand-father, lays it down, 'that by the fundamental law of the ſtate, there is a reciprocal and indiſſoluble relation between the prince and his deſcendants on one part, and his ſubjects and their deſcendants on the other, by a kind of contract, which appoints the ſovereign to reign, and the people to obey; a ſolemn engagement, by which they give up themſelves to one another for their mutual aid.'

"Such, Sir, has been the language of your parliament on the moſt deciſive occaſions. 'The kingdom belongs to the king (they ſaid to one of your predeceſſors) and the king to the kingdom; you are bound to preſerve the rights of your crown, which appertains to you and to your people; it is common to you, as the head, to your people and ſubjects, as to the members. Subjects owe their prince devotion and obedience; the prince owes his ſubjects protection and defence. The ſubjects can in no wiſe withdraw their obedience to the king: By a reciprocal conſequence the ſovereign ought not to forſake or abandon them: For in like manner as they owe him fidelity and aid, he owes them juſtice.'

Pontoiſe, May 28. Though the grand chamber's reſidence in this town may be called an exile, we may alſo truly ſay, that no exile ever was more honorable and brilliant. Since their arrival here they have daily received compliments from the deputies of ſome of the moſt reſpectable bodies in the nation. The nobleſſe in the neighbourhood alſo vye with each other in making their abode as agreeable as poſſible: The prince of Conti in particular has given them a grand entertainment at his caſtle of Vaureal, ſituated within a league of this place. Nothing can be more expreſſive of zeal, friendſhip and reſpect, than the ſpeeches of thoſe deputies: We admire in particular the harangue made by M. Fourneaux, rector of the univerſity of Paris, at the head of that body, the ſubſtance of which is as follows:

'Gentlemen,

'Your leaving the capital has thrown the inhabitants into a conſternation, and nothing but an univerſal mourning is to be ſeen: When they ſaw you depart, they fancied they ſaw juſtice, the laws themſelves, the public ſafety, all baniſhed along with you. In this general affliction none have ſuffered ſo much as the univerſity, as we glory in having no other guide but you, and finding no ſecurity but in your arms and under the wings of your protection. After having made it a duty to ſhew openly on all occaſions how ſtrongly we are attached to you, it would ill become us, at ſuch a juncture as this, to be backward in giving the ſame public teſtimony of it. Could we fail in this duty, without incurring ſhame and diſgrace? The prayers we daily make to the almighty are chiefly intended for obtaining the happineſs to ſee you reſtored to the ſeats of your anceſtors. Our ardent zeal makes our hearts and eyes follow you whitherſoever you are ſent: We therefore conjure and beſeech you, in conſideration of this zeal, to grant us the favour we promiſe ourſelves from it, by continuing to give us marks of your protection, and, with your uſual vigilance watching over the preſervation of our rights and intereſts.'

From the Gentleman's Magazine for June laſt.

The great chamber of the parliament of Paris continues at Pontoiſe, rather in a kind of triumph than in exile; having been daily congratulated and addreſſed, on their noble firmneſs and reſolution, by the moſt illuſtrious bodies, particularly the univerſity of Paris. The prince of Conti, who is talk'd of as the mediator, to reconcile them to his majeſty, has given them a moſt grand entertainment at his villa near that place; and the ways to Pontoiſe are continually crouded by all ranks, that reſort to pay their reſpects to theſe diſtinguiſh'd patriots. They ſtill, in their retreat, continue to proſecute the refuſers of the ſacrament, and perſiſt inflexibly by their arrets of the 5th and 7th of May. Their example is copied by the parliaments of Rouen, Aix, and Thoulouſe, and it may be gather'd from the mild anſwer given to the remonſtrances of the former, that the court begins to repent of the ſteps it has taken. What may perhaps contribute to the return of the parliament as much as any thing, is a meeting, which is ſoon expected, of the princes of the blood, dukes and peers of France, in order to conſult of proper methods to heal theſe breaches, and the diſgrace of the antient biſhop of Mirepoix, who has been ſucceeded by the cardinal de Rochefoucault. Matters, however, cannot remain long in ſuſpence, and a court with ſo many irons on the anvil; that is intriguing with the Turks, cajoling the Dutch, ſoothing the Seamands, and endeavouring to amuſe and deceive all the reſt of the world; muſt in conſequence ſlacken a little of its auſterity to keep peace at home.

[The following lines which have been publiſh'd in ſome of our news-papers, ſhould have received a different turn, ſince in reality the parliament of Paris is become ſo——ſh.

Strange that the Gallic ſenate is become,
Like that of Athens or of antient Rome!
Yet ſtranger ſtill! and what alas! more rare is,

Paris A la main, June 26. The king has changed the place of baniſhment of ſeveral members of the parliament. Inſtead of the towns they were at firſt ſent to, they are ordered to repair to their country ſeats, and there remain.

LONDON, June 7.

This day his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to 20 public and 14 private acts; amongſt which were,

An act for the better preventing of clandeſtine marriages.

An act to render more effectual an act made in the 12th year of her late majeſty queen Anne, (intitled, an act for providing a public reward for ſuch perſon as ſhall diſcover the longitude at ſea) with regard to the making experiments of propoſals made for diſcovering the longitude, and to enlarge the number of commiſſioners for putting in execution the ſaid act.

An act to permit perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion, to be naturalized by parliament. [This act, (which will be publiſhed in our next gazette) both before and ſince its paſſing, made a great noiſe in England, produced many pamphlets, and ſmart paragraphs in the papers; but ſeems to have been miſunderſtood by moſt people. Some of the petitioners againſt this bill, were fully heard at the bar of the H. of C. at the 3*d reading, but greater regard being had to reaſons in the petition for it, after ſome debate it paſſed* 95 to 96.]

After which his majeſty made a moſt gracious ſpeech to both houſes, in which his majeſty thanked them for the zeal they had ſhewn for his perſon and government, and for the care and aſſiduity they had exerted to advance the commerce, extend the manufactures of theſe kingdoms, and put a ſtop to ſome diſorders which wanted reformation. After which the parliament was prorogued to Tueſday the 14th of Auguſt next.

June 30. It is ſaid that upon ſome complaints lately made, two governors will ſpeedily be recalled in order to anſwer the accuſations againſt them.

THERE is a man that moſt does know,
Who was in goal ſome time ago,
And he had credit in that place,
Which now does prove to his diſgrace:
He ſays, that he's no trading man,
And Michael Tonge, muſt get it where he can;
I have a wife, and that is ſure,
But, free from duns ſhe keeps my door,
It's true, that ſhe is a free dealer,
Therefore the reſt I leave the reader:
As for his name I'll not expoſe,
Altho' he always wears green cloaths:
He will not work and I care not,
So the debt is d—— 'd and I forgot.

MICHAEL TONGE.
